Bonus point:

I don't think use mean to fill the null values is the best thing to do. I think use K-means clustering is the best way. Clustering method using unsupervised machine learning. All samples were divided into clusters by means of k-means clustering method, and then the missing values in each class were filled by means of the mean of the divided classes. In essence, the missing value is filled by similarity.